OAKLAND, Calif. - License plate reader data from some Bay Area police departments has been shared with federal law enforcement via a shared database, a new report found.

The San Francisco Standard reports that seven federal agencies have obtained information from San Francisco and Oakland police, according to California F

Record requests.

In at least one case, The Standard reported, Oakland police shared license plate reader data with federal law enforcement, including fulfilling a request related to an Immigration and Customs Enforcement investigation.

California law prohibits local agencies from sharing data, including automatic license plate readers from out-of-state or federal law enforcement.

Oakland police on Monday released a lengthy statement following The Standard's article.

"To be clear, no member of the Oakland Police Department was involved in the alleged sharing of ALPR information with Immigration and Customs Enforcement, according to the statement.

Consistent with state law, Oakland police share this license plate reader data with more than 80 California local and state law enforcement agencies, and "all of these agencies, including OPD, are subject to the California Values Act, which prohibits agencies from using resources for immigration enforcement purposes."

The Oakland Police Department noted that the data accessed by federal agencies comes from a shared database via the CHP.

In OPD's data sharing request form, the department said it requires all agencies using its system to "be in compliance" with state law.

As it relates to the sharing of data with any federal agency, OPD said it is verified that any access conducted by its members related to APLR data remains consistent with state law.

"We are very conscientious and sensitive to the use of emerging technology, continuing to explore solutions to support public safety, protect people's right to privacy, and build community trust," OPD said. "We are committed to transparency, accountability, and maintaining the trust of our community. We value our relationship with our media partners and want to ensure and encourage that the information they provide is accurate."
