But Flock Safety would send an email response to Hawley ahead of the hearing on September 8, saying it agreed “that the rules that protect Americans should be set by law” and not by the “policies of any single company.”

“Flock does not believe in its current leadership,” he said. “That is why Flock is looking at how this technology is used.”

The data is retained and searchable by law enforcement agencies across jurisdictions for 30 days.

While Flock launched an AI-powered “audit assistance” tool earlier this year to flag suspicious activity for municipal supervisors, reporting showed that victims often only discovered improper searches through independent public records requests and third-party tools like haveibeenflocked.com.

Privacy advocates and public records watchdogs also raised alarms after Flock removed officer names from external network searches and stripped license plate numbers entirely from system audit logs, severely limiting the public's ability to verify whether their vehicles had been searched.

“This is still the United States of America, and it shouldn't be that when you walk out your door in the morning, you just have to agree, in a sense, to accept the fact that you're gonna be on camera, morning, noon, and night,” Hawley added. “You'll be tracked by anybody and everybody in the world. You'll have no privacy whatsoever.”

U.S. Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Illinois, echoed calls for federal intervention, emphasizing the urgent need to address constitutional boundaries.

"We have got to find a way to balance in America privacy and security," Durbin said. "There is a balance. Congress

Bipartisan concern was further highlighted when U.S. Sen. Katie Britt, R-Alabama, entered into the official record a joint letter with Sen. Raphael Warnock, D-Georgia, expressing serious concerns over potential civil liberties violations stemming from the widespread deployment of license plate readers.

Innocent woman jailed for 13 days after errant camera match

Among the witnesses who testified was Lindsay Issacs, a Florida woman interviewed during Keefe's reporting who recounted how an automated camera match upended her life.

Issacs was arrested in Florida on charges of causing a fatal vehicle accident that killed three people after Florida troopers built their case around an ALPR hit. She spent nearly two weeks behind bars before a subsequent investigation proved law enforcement had identified the wrong vehicle.

Four witnesses testified Wednesday before a Senate subcommittee hearing on the use of AI-powered Sheriff Ross Teeple of Pinal County, Arizona, testified the latest AI-powered cameras pose a threat to constitutional rights. While Teeple noted the technology's utility in criminal investigations — citing a local case where ALPRs successfully tracked an aggressive driver who pushed a woman's car into oncoming traffic — he voiced alarm over transparency.

Teeple said he grew concerned about the technology. Though initially told it was just a tracking tool, he later learned it was capable of identifying license plates and predicting that

"The response I received was that the AI you were asking about."

"Why create this much data when we can't secure it?" Jordan asked, urging Congress to ensure any regulations placed on Flock apply universally across the surveillance industry, including competitors like Axon.

Civil liberties advocates call for federal guidelines

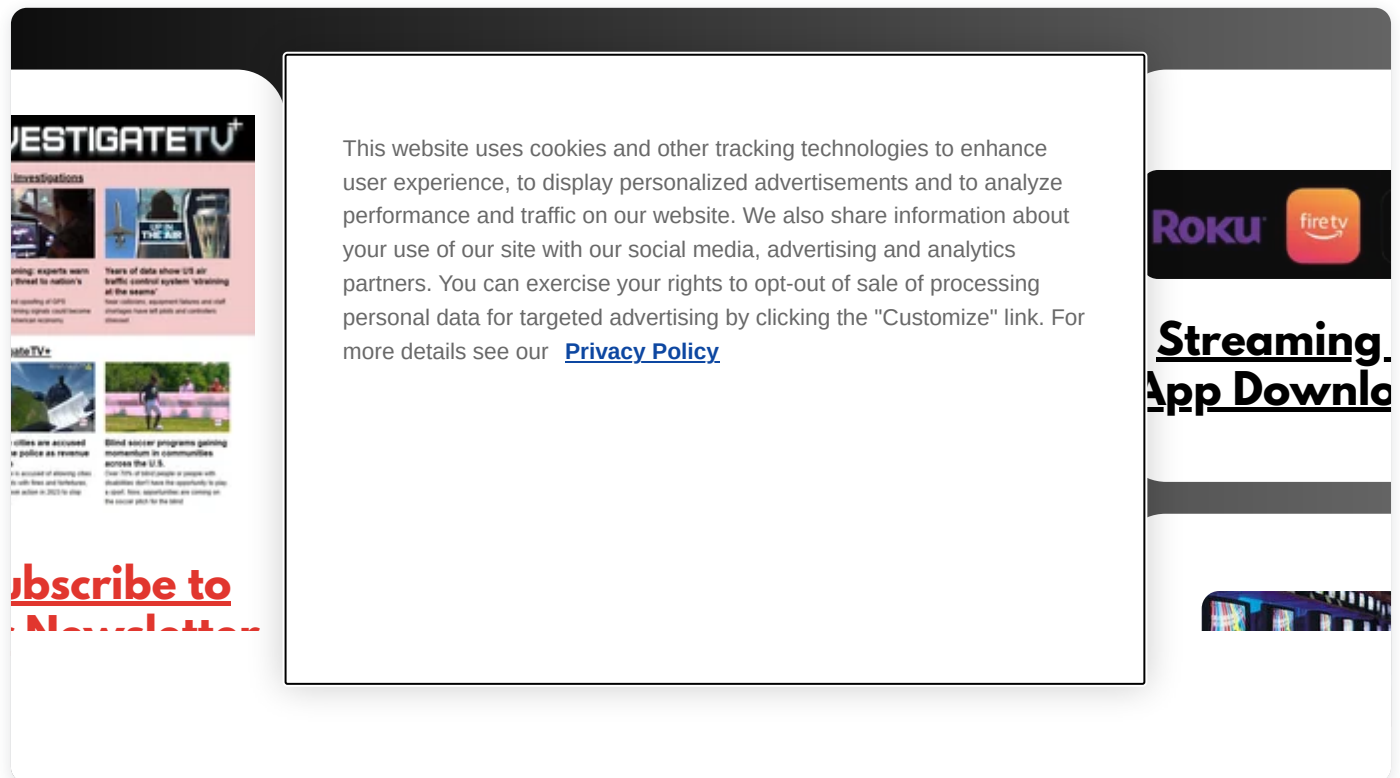

Chad Marlow, senior policy counsel for the American Civil Liberties Union, told the committee venture capital investment has transformed public-safety tools into an unchecked surveillance industry.

"The explosion of ALPR use and its tracking of innocent people reflects a view that if ALPR use is scaled up, it could produce the massive profits venture capitalists seek," Marlow said. "Welcome to the surveillance-industrial complex, America."

Marlow testified that Flock's existing safeguards fail to address the core problem of systemic misuse and urged Congress to use its spending powers to halt the technology entirely.

"The time has come for Congress to ban any law enforcement entity who receives federal funding from using ALPRs," Marlow said. "This prohibition should be without exceptions — when it comes to protecting core American civil rights and civil liberties, if you make one exception, you invite others, and that is a slippery slope we must avoid at all costs.”
