CEDAR RAPIDS, Iowa (KCRG) - Cedar Rapids police and city leaders hosted a question-and-answer meeting Tuesday night on the department's planned switch from Flock to Axon license plate reader cameras. Residents at the meeting asked who can access the data and what safeguards prevent misuse.

The department say

Police say Axon would work better with technology officers already use. The proposed contract amendment lists an annual cost of $98,415.

Resident raises concerns about searches

Echo Elam came to the meeting looking for answers. Elam wants to know who can search the information collected by the cameras and what keeps that access in check.

"I believe that what they are planning and what they are doing violates everyone's Fourth Amendment rights," Elam said.

"The issue comes in where there's no warrant required for the search. You just see the case number. It can be any case number," Elam said.

Those concerns were part of a broader discussion about privacy, police oversight and how the department plans to use the technology. The public submitted more than 100 questions about the technology and police oversight ahead of the meeting.

Police describe data rules

Police say the cameras capture license plates, not faces, and the data is kept for 30 days. Searches must be tied to a law enforcement purpose.

Interim Cedar Rapids Police Chief Tom Jonker said the department knows the public wants safeguards.
