New surveillance cameras on hold for Burlingame

Councilmembers voice a need for more policy framework, cite privacy and policing concerns

Burlingame councilmembers last week indicated they were still unready to approve the use of automated license plate reading cameras within the city, citing a need to further understand how the technology would be applied and how the city could prevent misuse.

The cameras, called ALPRs, would be placed strategically throughout the city to collect plate numbers and vehicle descriptions to alert officers to the whereabouts of vehicles suspected of being involved in a crime. Data would also be stored for a set amount of time for potential law enforcement use later.
