The internal investigation found Zandlo used police technology and databases for purposes unrelated to law enforcement.

Due to the findings of JPD's internal investigation and the nature of the allegations, the matter was referred to the FBI for further investigation. The case was presented to a federal grand jury following a joint review of the findings by the District Attorney General's Office and the United States Attorney's Office, resulting in the federal charge.

The Jackson Police Department will also request that the Tennessee Peace Officers Standards and Training Commission revoke Zandlo's certification as a law enforcement officer.

Chief's statement

"The Jackson Police Department holds all officers to the highest standards of integrity, professionalism, and accountability," said Chief Thom Corley. "Constitutional Policing is a foundational pillar at JPD, and the expectation that our officers adhere to it is non-negotiable. We remain committed to ensuring our personnel uphold the moral and ethical standards expected by the community we serve."
