South San Francisco council OKs license plate reading cameras

City allows 31 cameras along transit arteries to deter crime

South San Francisco will get 31 new surveillance cameras to be placed along Highway 101 and Interstate 280 following a unanimous vote from the City Council approving the new law enforcement measure.

The cameras, called automated license plate readers, have been increasingly installed in the Bay Area with several Peninsula cities recently approving their use. By capturing images of passing vehicles and logging plate numbers, make and color, the technology can alert nearby officers if a vehicle suspected of being involved in a crime is spotted. Officers can also access data after the fact to aid in police work.
