those data points paint a picture of your movements over a 30-day period. Flock's newest cameras are actually designed to pan, tilt and zoom to follow movements. National Investigator Brendan Keefe interviews a security researcher who found dozens of those cameras streaming openly to the internet for anyone to watch.

We also show how one man built his own national database of Flock cameras to crowdsource their locations, helping ordinary people chart paths to avoid them. Criminals can use that information, too, pitting mass surveillance versus public safety.

The Grappler

Police pursuits aren't just dangerous — they can be deadly, and federal data shows fatal chases have surged in recent decades, often killing innocent bystanders.

National Investigative Reporter Kristin Crowley examines a fast-growing tool some departments say can end a pursuit before it begins: "The Grappler," a device that shoots a net to wrap a fleeing vehicle's tire and bring it to a stop.

From a Kansas department reporting major success to dramatic dashcam videos from around the country, we dig into how the Grappler works and why there may be cause for concern when it's deployed.

Americans drowning in debt

New analysis from Consumer Affairs finds the average person now owes about $63,000, that's roughly 40 percent more than what they make in a year.

In this Watching Your Wallet, Consumer Investigator Rachel DePompa takes a hard look at how deep in debt Americans have become.
