addressed in the new policy.

The city voted in September to approve the original policy and to move forward with the license plate readers, also known as Flock cameras.

On Tuesday night, the council clarified when officers can take action based on alerts from the Flock cameras and expanded data sharing with other agencies that already use the technology in Johnson County — North Liberty and the University of Iowa Police Department.

The data is currently stored for 30 days before it's deleted. But city council members are split over that time frame moving forward.

"I feel very strongly about this," Coralville City Council Member Rich Vogelzang said. These cameras are for the benefit of public safety."

"I think it has the potential to be abused by ICE and other agencies," Coralville City Council Member Mike Knudson said.

Two automatic license plate readers are currently in place with several more coming as part of the city's two year, $36,000 contract with Flock.
