BASTROP, Texas (KBTX) - Bastrop City Council has voted to immediately terminate its contract with Flock, as well as prevent any future license plate reading technology from coming to the city.

“The surprise was that they decided to not only stop the contract as well. So I think it was a good move.”

Last week, Bastrop City Council cemented their removal of Flock cameras from the city.

“I’d like to see things stay permanent and go forward. I’m glad to see how this council has responded to what we’ve heard,” said Bush.

ward a resolution to terminate the license plate reader contracts with Flock, a Bastrop resident.

After a citizen push, they decided to stop the cameras.

“I’m glad that would be a permanent fix. I’m really pleased with the choices that have been made.”

Flock has been a heated topic of discussion as residents, along with city and state officials across the nation, are debating if Flock’s license plate reading technology is being used properly.

“And we’ve had evidence that it has helped us. But then there’s also, you know, where there’s been a misuse of technology and the concerns of the privacy, the encroachment, the data collection and access to our personal information and how much control we really have over that,” said Ishmael Harris, the Mayor of Bastrop.

Bastrop is the 5th city or county in the past month to terminate their contracts, according to DeFlock. This also comes as Gov. Greg Abbott announced a pause in funding the cameras and Sen. Lois Kolkhorst called for an outright ban of Flock cameras.

“Local municipalities actually have more power to guide how this technology is deployed in city limits than the federal government right now,” said Stacy Collins, another Bastrop resident.

Bush says that he hopes Bastrop is just the beginning of similar votes.

College Station is set for a vote on their contract on September 24th. Bryan has yet to set a date for a vote or discussion.
