Sheriff falls short on Flock transparency

Re: "Unregulated cameras face vigilante attacks" (Page A11, Sept 5).

Thank you for the op-ed detailing abuses of surveillance cameras in American communities. Accurately describing them as “a tool of mass, indiscriminate surveillance,” Catherine Crump reports the State Auditor found that of 320 million camera images stored by the Los Angeles Police Department, 99.9% were of vehicles not on a “hot list” (suspected of involvement in a crime).

Alameda County Sheriff Yesenia Sanchez, sworn to uphold the law, has admitted violations of state law occurred when Flock surveillance images were shared with federal agencies. She claims to be completely transparent, but her Flock camera “Transparency Portal,” when selected, flashes a warning that you are leaving the Sheriff’s website and that they are “not responsible for the content of external sites.” You are then sent to a Flock public relations page touting its mass surveillance system. So much for transparency.

There is more to police work than public sees

This past summer, I completed a full, in-person internship with the Hayward Police Department’s Records and Property Bureau. During that time, I worked alongside staff and conducted firsthand interviews and research with people across Records, youth diversion, Youth & Family Services, counseling and mental-health response programs.

I entered the internship expecting to learn mostly about traditional policing. Instead, I found an entire side of public safety that receives far less attention: records staff processing thousands of reports, counselors supporting families and students, youth coordinators helping young people find a second chance and clinicians connecting people in crisis with services.

Americans should be outraged by the conservative majority of the United States Supreme Court giving the green light to President Trump's executive order, which will restrict mail-in voting.

This is personal because for several years, I have used mail-in voting for issues such as defending the way of life of Indigenous peoples and preserving clean water. I felt violated when Trump and the conservative majority of the United States Supreme Court want to deny me my right to participate in the democratic process.

Save low-income homes for low-income workers

Re: "High earners, low rents: 1 in 8 pay below market" (Page A1, Sept. 6).

What is happening?

How can any entity provide well below rental market value for a property and not hold the tenant to the lease agreement of "low income"? I am dumbfounded that in a state where most public service workers, most food service workers, most college students, most elderly, most disabled ... everyone barely surviving would be the victims, yes victims, of the scam that doesn't require proof of low income every year.

To indicate, as in the article, that they "would hope" that when renters earned more they would relinquish the apartment to provide housing to someone in need is absurd. Who are these people scamming the innocent taxpayer?
