Richmond police said they made an arrest Friday in a deadly shooting after using automated license plate readers to track a suspect vehicle to another Bay Area city.

The shooting happened on the 200 block of West Nevin Avenue, a cul-de-sac between the Richmond Parkway and C Street, around 6:27 p.m. Friday, according to the Richmond Police Department. The adult victim was shot repeatedly and died at the scene.

The department said its officers “quickly identified a possible suspect” and followed a suspect vehicle out of town and into Concord using the ALPR technology, run by the company Flock. Concord police helped take the suspect into custody later that evening.

Richmond police said the suspect was booked on suspicion of murder. The department did not release any further details about the shooting or the suspect in a news release.

Richmond is among a spate of Bay Area cities that have recently reconsidered their relationships with Flock over privacy and data-sharing concerns. However, the Richmond City Council in March reportedly voted to extend its contract with Flock through the end of the year.

In this case, Richmond police said the technology was critical in “helping investigators identify and arrest a homicide suspect within approximately eight hours of the shooting.”

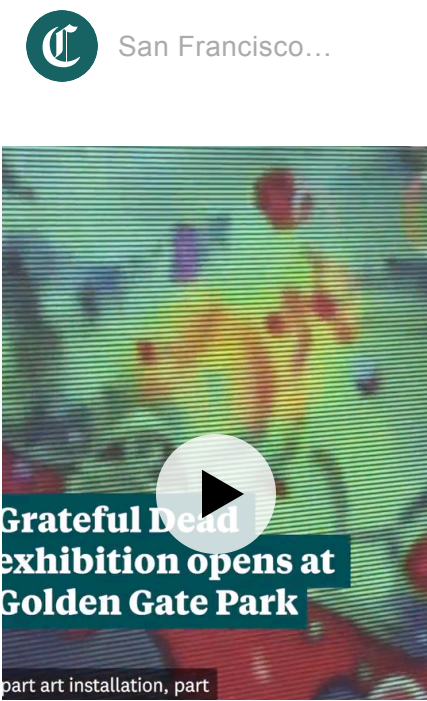

Police said the investigation is ongoing.
