A Flock representative was also at the meeting to answer council members' questions about how data is stored and shared.

A former city council member who voted in favor of the cameras in 2024 also spoke against keeping them.

Police Chief Diane Venenga said the department has made changes to its technology. She said the department will now store information for seven days instead of 30.

"The information is hard sanitized after seven days and we are committed to using the system for legitimate law enforcement purposes," Venenga said. "I think we've shown we are able to adapt and move along with this technology."

Many people at the meeting were not convinced and raised concerns about Flock's technology.

"This is not a criticism of our police officers," one speaker said during public comment. "This is about the technology, the information it collects, and the fact we are handing that information over to a private third-party company we don't have any input on."

Council members debated whether to remove the cameras or keep them with stronger safeguards. They did not reach a final decision.

Instead, council members said they needed more time to consider changes to the camera system. They voted [illegible] two weeks.
